DESCRIPTION

The COVID-19 pandemic has impacted almost every aspect of life in America. Unique stressors, not previously faced, have had negative effects on individuals, couples, and families. In order to best help and support clients during this unprecedented time, psychologists and other mental health professionals must be aware of pandemic-specific factors which may result in trauma.

Ethical care demands that all psychotherapists be aware of their own personal views and beliefs about current events to minimize bias and countertransference. It is also imperative that therapists be able to adopt therapeutic techniques to remotely treat trauma on livestream platforms. Please join Dr. Heather Ulrich, clinical psychologist, for this highly-relevant ethics seminar. This is a great opportunity to obtain ethics hours needed to renew your clinical license, while simultaneously increasing insight necessary to provide optimal remote care in this time of crisis.

FACULTY

Heather Ulrich, PhD, is a licensed psychologist in the states of North Carolina and Delaware, with exceptional expertise in the fields of infant mental health, attachment, child development, family dynamics, relational neurobiology, trauma, and toxic stress. Dr. Ulrich has practiced in a wide variety of settings including academia, community mental health centers, private practice, and research-based programs. As a compelling and captivating speaker, Dr. Ulrich has presented practical, evidence-based information and clear solutions at national conferences for a multitude of organizations. Currently, she has a successful practice providing telehealth-based therapy to the families of Delaware and North Carolina. Dr. Ulrich also founded "Parent 911," an online parent coaching and education organization serving families across the United States and around the world.
